minutes ApowerMirror is intuitive, as you just have to follow a few instructions to have the connection initiated. While Android devices can be connected to ApowerMirror both via a USB cable and Wi-Fi, iOS phones can only connect via Wi-Fi. There is no need for you to deploy any counterpart application for the chosen mobile platform, as ApowerMirror takes care of it all. Once it detects the connected device, it starts downloading the ApowerMirror mobile app. Unfortunately, this operation is done without asking you for explicit permission, but you are prompted to authorize the initial access of the application to your phone. You should take the time to check the access permissions of the mobile app, as it might access your contacts and data. Share the phone's screen and remote control the handset The next thing you will notice is that the phone's screen is displayed on your computer's monitor, therefore, at a higher scale. This makes ApowerMirror perfect for movie watching or playing mobile games. You practically get to play an Android or an iOS game on your computer. ApowerMirror

does not only mirror the computer's screen, but it enables you to control the handset using the PC's keyboard and mouse. While connected to the PC, the phone can also be used normally. View the phone's screen on your computer's monitor The purpose of ApowerMirror is to allow the user to stream phone content on a larger screen: the computer's monitor. It gets a plus, as configuring the connection is not difficult, and everything can be ready in minutes. The automatic deployment of the mobile app counterpart can be a bit problematic, so it's best if you read the license and documentation beforehand.
